Abstract The spread of the COVID-19 epidemic has changed the education system. Teachers are encouraged to continue the online teaching process through various platforms including Skype, Zoom, and Google Meet. Therefore, this study used Zoom application to look at the 7E learning cycle model's (7E LC) effect on student activities and critical thinking skills in chemistry teaching. This study is a quasi-experiment and only has a post-test design. The sample for this study is 110-grade students from Yogyakarta 4 High School in Indonesia selected by random sampling technique. Two classes were selected as the samples, one as an experimental class where the 7E LC was implemented and another one as the control class where the learning used direct instruction model. The student's learning activity data were collected through questionnaire and the student's critical thinking skills data were obtained through an open-ended hydrolysis problem test. According to the MANOVA model, the difference between students' learning activities and students' critical thinking ability is analyzed. The result of this study is that there are significant differences in student activities and critical thinking skills between the experimental class and the control class.

The announcement was issued to reduce the physical distance to reduce the spread of coronavirus disease and the burden on the health system. Online learning requires a variety of facilities, such as the Internet, and electronic products such as laptops or phones. Students and teachers will live in different places. This is a supplement to normal classroom learning [1], [2]. This online learning is carried out by using various platforms such as Skype, Zoom, Google Meet, Webex, and Microsoft Teams [3].

The teaching and learning process must still be carried out, even though it has to go through online learning, so that students can still gain knowledge in this pandemic COVID-19. One of the educational goals is to enable students to have independent, effective and creative knowledge and skill systems [4]. According to Triand [5], teachers can help students think, research, and develop solutions to problems. In the teaching process, students actively participate in teaching and processing
