Learning to Rank Relevant Files for Bug Reports Using Domain Knowledge, Replication and Extension of a Learning-to-rank Approach Nasir Safdari,2018 Bug localization is one of the most important stages of the bug fixing process Bad practices make the debugging a tedious task Investigating bugs can contribute up to a large portion of the aggregate cost for a software project An automated strategy that can provide a ranked list of source code files with respect to how likely they contain the root cause of the problem would help the development teams to decrease the search space and leads to increase in the productivity In this work I have replicated the bug localization approach presented in cite ye2014learning that applies the learning to rank technique to rank the relevant files for each bug This technique applies domain knowledge by evaluating the textual similarity between bug reports and source code files and API specification documents plus bug fixing and code alteration history For a given bug report the ranking function is constructed based on the linear combination of weighted features where the features are trained on previously solved bug reports In addition to replication of the mentioned technique I have extended the study by evaluating the role of different text preprocessing techniques such as Stemming and Lemmatization and also a randomized selection of training folds on the overall performance of the ranking model I found that Lemmatization of the words and randomized selection of the training folds have an adverse effect on the performance of the ranking model and consequently having lower accuracy and precision of the results Abstract Die, Bug, Die Les Martin,1997-01-01 When killer roaches attack the small town of Miller s Grove agents Mulder and Scully investigate the possibility that a swarm of alien insects has invaded the earth
