+ Systemic arterial hypertension is characterized by persistent high blood pressure (BP) in the arteries. Most affected individuals have primary hypertension, which is caused by multifactorial gene-environment interactions. Hypertension can also be the result of another condition (secondary hypertension) or a monogenic inherited disease.

DIAGNOSIS

Hypertension is generally asymptomatic and many affected people are unaware that they have it. All adults should have their BP measured regularly by their health care provider. Out-of-office methods to measure BP can uncover white coat hypertension (in which BP is elevated at the doctor's office but otherwise normal) and masked hypertension (in which BP is normal at the doctor's office but elevated otherwise). Accurate BP measurement is necessary to diagnose hypertension, and assessment of a patient's BP-related cardiovascular disease (CVD) risk and comorbid conditions (including stroke, coronary artery disease, heart failure and peripheral vascular disease), as well as BP pattern, is needed to guide management.

1 Monogenic forms of hypertension are rare. Genome-wide association studies have identified >120 loci that are associated with BP regulation.

EPIDEMIOLOGY

Global prevalence of hypertension is estimated to have tripled since 1975. High systolic BP is the greatest single risk factor contributing to the global burden of disease and to global all-cause mortality. Hypertension is associated with increased risk of CVD and renal disease.

OUTLOOK

Overall, the prevalence of hypertension and the hypertension-associated global burden are increasing, particularly in low-income and middle-income countries. This increase is partly due to global population growth and aging. To reduce the burden, public health policy should encourage healthy diets and lifestyles and routine BP monitoring.

MECHANISMS

Physiological BP levels are maintained through a complex interplay of various components of an integrated neurohormonal system including the renin-angiotensin-aldosterone system (RAAS). Disruption of factors involved in BP control in any of these systems can directly or indirectly lead to hypertension.

PREVENTION

The association between BP and CVD risk highlights the importance of prevention. The same lifestyle changes that are recommended for the management of hypertension are effective as preventive strategies.

QUALITY OF LIFE

Being diagnosed with hypertension can be associated with worsening of health-related quality of life. While antihypertensive drugs are generally well-tolerated, treatment-related reductions in BP can have a negative effect on efficacy, and frail patients who are at high risk of hypotension, which could lead to falls, dizziness and cognitive impairment.
