

Napoleonic Tactical Formations - French Infantry Battalion 1808-1815

An understrength French battalion of 600 men from 1808. Six companies/platoons each of about 100 men in 33 files and 3 ranks. The musketeers of each company occupy 18.5m x 6.975m; add another 1.3m depth for officers and NCOs behind the men making 18.5m x 2.3m. In line the battalion is 113.5m long and 2.3m deep. This would expand in combat up to 25% (138m). The column of march has the same maximum official length, i.e. 113.5m, but could be shorter. A column by divisions was two platoons wide (37m). The open column by divisions has a similar depth to its width (39.3m) to allow companies to wheel out of formation. Other columns are much more compressed with the close column being at most 6.9m deep. French doctrine of the time was to put the 2nd and 3rd platoons in the lead division to facilitate changes of formation; this was called an attack column (colonne d'attaque). Other nations, and earlier French practice, was to lead with the most senior company (grenadiers if present, otherwise 1st company of fusiliers). A column by platoons was only one platoon wide (18.5m).
