(Re)Dressing American Fashion Emma McClendon, Lauren Downing Peters, 2025-03-25 Expanding the history of American fashion this volume highlights garments that carry material traces of everyday wearers bodies such as stains rips tears mending and signs of handcraftsmanship In depth examinations of ten case study objects ranging from activist Jae Jarrell's Urban Wall Suit ca 1969 to an unknown child's pair of sneakers found at a migrant pickup site in the Sonoran Desert 2009 10 reveal the ways worn objects are witnesses to American history

By foregrounding worn ordinary and imperfect garments the essays in this volume respond to the fact that histories of American fashion have traditionally centered on mass manufactured American sportswear notable designers whitewashed histories of Western wear and the American Look This canon though familiar stands starkly at odds with the lived realities of the American experience Interviews with wearers and makers family photographs and detailed object photography illuminate absences and omissions in the dominant narratives of American fashion Re Dressing American Fashion Wear as Witness thus sheds new light on how fashion and dress have been used to shape and challenge constructs of American identity at the intersections of race ethnicity body size ability and gender over more than two centuries
