Ron Rozelle's new novel Touching Winter is a four part evocation of memory and place and the yearning for home. Each part of the novel begins with a meditation on one aspect of the protagonist's life as he watches the unpredictable weather of East Texas. When Will was a young boy he and his grandfather enjoyed being out in the spectacular East Texas storms. These sessions taught Will many things about life, ranching, weather, character, how to be a man, and bound Will to the family land and to his grandfather. Only at the ranch does Will feel like the person he was or would like to be before wrong decisions turned his life down an entirely different path. A powerful early romance turned disastrous but the relationship haunts him. To compensate for lost love Will carved a niche for himself in the competitive concrete industry, inventing a technique to make mixing trucks more efficient and becoming wealthier than he could have dreamed. His marriage to a Houston socialite is thin and brittle, unsatisfying for his wife Lauren and for himself. Their daughter Aimee lives in California as far away from her family as possible. As Will ages he turns to the ranch as a place of clarity in times of crisis, eventually moving back there entirely. He exchanges the public life he and Lauren led in Houston for the simplicity of walks along the rustic fence, lunch at the town's only diner with old friends, and long evenings on the porch watching the stars. Along the way a fierce red breasted hawk comes to represent the spiritual for Will and he is forced to face the consequences of earlier decisions. Old and new, 1873 The Works of Lord Bacon Francis Bacon,2023-03-05 Reprint of the original first published in 1871.
