

mounting them in a cabinet.

Struggling about the great provinces, the Taira dominated court politics. They used their might to cement his dynasty by marrying off his daughter to the emperor in 1173. He installed Minamoto, twelve-year-old grandson, as emperor in 1180 instead of the incumbent emperor's brother, Prince Morihito.

Spurred from the throne before he got to sit on it, Prince Morihito was not impressed. He issued a call to arms and summoned the Minamoto to help him rid the world of the troublesome Taira clan once and for all. This was just what Yoritomo was waiting for: he wanted to avenge his murdered father and led a Minamoto uprising that came to a head with the bloody Genpei War (1180–85).

The Kamakura Period (1185–1333): Yoritomo's Movement

Yoritomo amassed a large following in the eastern provinces far away from Kyoto and plotted his revenge attack under the guise of “restoring” the court from Taira clutches. He promised the lord of Minamoto land to dutifully recognize any claim to land if they swore allegiance to him. This was a juicy prospect for disenfranchised Minamoto vassals.

Softened by a luxurious life at court, the Taira were eventually crushed in the five-year Genpei War. The final clash was a naval battle in the bay around Dan-no-ura in 1185. Realizing that the end was near, Taira Kiyomoto's wife, Tokiko, grabbed her grandson Arisue along with the imperial regalia and an ill-fated pair of the first battle in the Genpei War (1185–86). The Taira forces were routed by the Minamoto at Dan-no-ura.

chose death over the humiliation of capture. She jumped off her vessel into the briny sea below.

Mission accomplished, Yoritomo then established Japan's first warrior government (shogunate) in Kamakura, not far from modern-day Tokyo. It was essentially an independent state in the east run by warriors for warriors and was to be a way of replacement of the imperial government in Kyoto. Yoritomo clearly advised the emperor to legitimize his military supremacy: he was granted the lofty title sei-i tai-sei or “warrior-quieting grandissimo,” along with carte blanche to pretty much do whatever he wanted.

Minamoto-no-Yoritomo (1147–99): The Jealous Genius

Yoritomo is most certainly a famous figure you can't want to know. As we have seen, he was the Minamoto warrior chieftain who set up the first warrior government in the small seaside village of Kamakura after the successful uprising against the Taira who were ruling courts in court politics in Kyoto. Yoritomo was careful to receive imperial support to avoid being branded a rebel leader. He was “the best,” and after he had recognized the Taira, the emperor bestowed upon him the title of emperor and legitimized his operations on the other side of the country.

He was clearly a shrewd tactician who knew the importance of keeping his minions happy. To this end, he established landholdings and titles to reward his loyal vassals, and to keep them loyal. In return, they pledged fealty and military service to a “you scratch my back, and I’ll scratch yours” back-courtesy relationship. In spite of his skill as an administrator and military commander, he was intensely suspicious of any potential contender and ruthlessly exterminated a number of his relatives. He only had two very young sons to fill his boots when he died aged 50 after falling off a horse. They were also struck rather violently by stroke—well, these relatives actually frank were the ones.

Speaking of Biggie: The Choppage Topknot

Well, our wig, but strange hairstyles that were popular among samurai—the choppage. The pate of the head was shaved like a woman's bunchee and the hair at the back and sides was grown long and tied into a topknot. It was originally designed to make the wearing of battle helmets (kabuto): a more comfortable and lighter option. Shaving the pate of the head made it less stuffy. The topknot also served as a type of padding inside the helmet to stop the waxy chafing on the metal bunchee, a full head of hair was messy and usually, a source of amusement if one's wiggle happened to be removed as a trophy in battle. One gentleman's appearance was a question of honor!

As Japan modernized during the Meiji period, the government tried to remove symbols of their feudal past. They issued the “Cropped Hair Edict” in 1870, which encouraged all men to adopt Western hairstyles. Many samurai samurai refused to wear foreign hairstyles to get photographs of their topknots before toppling them off.

Sometimes, professional hair smoothers have topknots but without shaved pates. Occasionally you will see one reminiscent of the old samurai style, but this is because he is generally going back to the topknot in an important manner for entering some occasions, and dignitaries and patrons are invited to take it off one day of a tour with considerable pomp and ceremony.

Minamoto-no-Yoritomo (1159–89): Japan's Tragic Hero

Yoritomo was Yoritomo's younger sibling whose still shines brilliantly as Japan's classic tragic hero. He was one of Yoritomo's most successful generals in the Genpei War but his popularity proved to be his downfall. When the young Minamoto brothers were cast into exile by Taira Kiyomoto, Yoritomo was placed in a struggle in Kawasayama, Kyoto. It is there, generations of story-tellers tell us, that he learned the art of gentlemanship from the mythical Tengu. Little is known about his childhood, but his presence as a warrior, although useful in war, left him open to ridicule in the aftermath. One of Yoritomo's close friends to Yoritomo that his brother was readying himself for the top job. The sibling friction was picked up on by a meddling emperor, Go-Shirakawa, who played the brothers against each other.

By late 1185 Yoritomo knew that the present Yoritomo was after his head and decided to resolve. Under Taira's order with Yoritomo but both were ultimately betrayed and Yoritomo was reduced to killing out in and around Kyoto. He managed to find shelter with Fujiwara Nobun, his childhood cousin. When Nobun died in 1187, his last will and testament declared that Yoritomo was to inherit the “governorship of Mino.”

Even Nobun's powerful son and a military vanguard to Kamakura to seek him out. He attack was ordered. Hired up in a mission, Yoritomo's legendary steed, Double Horse, fell off the attacking force single-headed.

In giving Yoritomo time to enjoy his life with and then commit suicide. Yoritomo's head was preserved and transported back to Kamakura for confirmation. Those who saw it lamented at the least-making demise of this great hero of the Genpei War. In fact, when Yoritomo fell off his horse and died, they attributed it to the angry ghost of Yoritomo. There was even a popular theory that he escaped with his life and made his way to the land of the Shogun. And that he was, in fact, Gough's Ghost (Gouji - Gouji).

After Yoritomo's death, a supporter of Yoritomo wrote in his diary “In bravery, honorability, and justice, Yoritomo is found to have a great name to posterity. In this he was only be admired and praised. The only thing is that he decided to rebel against Yoritomo. This was a great mistake after.” The poor guy was probably flawed, but honestly, the term Japan's (especially for the movement Yoritomo) is still used today and means “to support the underdog.”
