

1960s – THEE LINKS OF SOCIOLOGY

The papers explored practitioner-client relations and case studies in a variety of areas, including law, family, community, race relations, and delinquency. Steve Lube, captain S. M. Miller (2004) revealed that he regretted the use of the term applied sociology because it was highly ambiguous—did it refer to sociologists employed outside academia, to academic sociologists who did studies for nonprofit and voluntary organizations whether paid for or not, to social workers or to public policy critics and intellectuals?—and because it was little linkage between applied work and sociological study.

When Paul Lazarfeld was elected AAA president, he proposed that the theme for the 1962 meetings be “Sociology in Action” or “Applied Sociology” to highlight the combination of applied and case studies in theoretical and methodological advances. The AAA Executive Council, however, changed it to “Uses of Sociology,” which also became the title of an edited volume of 11 invited papers. The term soon went beyond applied sociology to encourage where and to what extent sociological findings and perspectives were used by practitioners, business, voluntary agencies, the military, schools, and public bodies. Authors were asked to address the difficulties of translating practical issues into research problems and to discuss the methodological gaps between research findings and advice for action (Lazarsfeld, Nowell, and Wiskow 1967, xi). According to Griffin (1987:444), most authors had problems doing the latter—that is, identifying concrete applications of sociological ideas or findings.

In a provocative essay, Robert C. Angell (1967:111), raised some ethical issues concerning applied research. He warned that since such research is used to further the practical ends of business, voluntary associations, or government, it would take only a slight distortion in the sampling procedures or in the phrasing of questions to obtain findings desired by the client. Because they do not have the high calling of developing abstract scientific knowledge, he argued that the applied researcher cannot claim the special privileges that are sometimes enjoyed by those who do. For example, while it may be sometimes ethical to deceive subjects for the purpose of obtaining important new scientific knowledge, provided they are later debriefed, this justification cannot, in Angell’s opinion, be used for applied research because the ends are not scientific ones.

Three edited volumes on applied sociology written from the perspective of disciplinary sociology, however, failed to take the wind out of the sails. In fact, in his AAA presidential address, Blount (1960) noted that from 1960 to 1966 applied social research enjoyed a boom period in which sociology, as a discipline, had not really shrunk. Eventually the War on Poverty generated large-scale applied research involving needs assessments for program planning, dissemination and pilot services, and program evaluations, which were policy, governmental, and could not easily be translated into academic publications. Dunbar (2002) estimated that, from 1960 to 1975, approximately 100 social science research and development firms were established, a third of which were located in the Washington, D.C., suburbs. Finally several specialized applied social research centers were created, such as the Denver Research Center at the Ohio State University in 1963, now at the University of Delaware.

In 1964, the U.S. Office of Education commissioned James S. Coleman to determine how educational opportunities, defined as a combination of school buildings, trained teachers, and curricula, were distributed by race and ethnicity. The Report, Equality of Educational Opportunity (Coleman et al. 1966), which reached all 1st-, 4th-, 8th-, and 12th-grade students in 4,000 schools, not only documented the pervasiveness of segregation in the schools but went beyond the rather narrow Congressional mandate to explore how parental education and social status as well as peer pressure affected student achievement (Blount 1966; Blount and Whyte 1983; Dunbar 2002). If the findings were controversial, the subsequent implementation of desegregation and the flight of white families from city schools were even more so. Coleman (1976), who originally supported school integration, changed his mind in the 1970s when he concluded that the policies that focused wholly on within-district busing actually increased rather than reduced school segregation.

The Coleman Report (Coleman et al. 1966) fueled the argument that doing applied research for government agencies substantially limits intellectual and political independence and that applied researchers are at the beck and call of decision makers and policy implementers (Dunbar 2002). Blount (1966) pointed out that the applied researcher could negotiate and in some cases broaden the scope of the study to include sociological variables and factors. On the other hand, it also illustrates Blount’s point that applied social research may be used to justify formation and become embedded in massive bureaucracy in which the work is attacked, minimized, or unappreciated, and that sociologists are indirectly but directly involved in decision making, policy formation, or program implementation. Like Ward and Ogburn before him, Blount warned that applied social research is not for would-be philosopher kings.

During this time, studies continued to bridge the gap between pure and applied research. For example, Benjamin Blount’s (1964) work on stability of IQ during early childhood later provided Head Start with data on where boys in inner-city with compulsory preschool educational programs, William Sewell’s study (Sewell, Blount, and Featherman 1970) on status attainment began as a state-sponsored survey of Wisconsin high school seniors, and Dorothy Moss Kanner (1977, 1987) published her own research on corporations for a broader audience.
