this family of bridges This volume discusses the behavior characteristics that influence the load carrying capacity of this fleet of bridges In particular the live load distribution partial composite action and bearing restraint were investigated as potential factors that could influence the bridge ratings Implementing fleet management practices the bridges were analyzed to determine if the load test results could be predicted to better analyze previously untested bridges For this family of bridges it was found that the ratings increased as a result of the load testing demonstrating a greater capacity than determined analytically Volume II of this report focuses on evaluating the timber substructure for this family of bridges In this volume procedures for detecting pile internal decay using nondestructive ultrasonic stress wave techniques correlating nondestructive ultrasonic stress wave techniques to axial compression tests to estimate deteriorated pile residual strength and evaluating load distribution through poor performing timber substructure elements by instrumenting and load testing the abutments of the six selected bridges are discussed Also in this volume pile repair methods for restoring axial and bending capacities of pile are developed and evaluated
