

Stage 1

One of the Universe's first generation of stars — a behemoth about 300 times the mass of our Sun — nears the end of its life.

Stage 2

In a cataclysmic explosion, the star utterly destroys itself in an event called a pair-instability supernova. This titanic explosion jettisons the star's entire contents, which includes the elements iron and magnesium in a distinctive ratio, into its primordial surroundings.

Stage 3

Over time, the stellar remains make their way to the regions surrounding a quasar, an active supermassive black hole. Billions of years later as the light from the quasar travels across the cosmos, astronomers using the Gemini North telescope on Hawaii, operated by NSF's NOIRLab, are able to detect and decode the telltale chemical remains of one of the Universe's earliest stars.
