

IMPROVING FORAGE AND SEED YIELD IN TEMPERATE FORAGE LEGUMES

Athole H. Marshall, Rosemary Collins,

Summary: Forage legume breeding at IGER is building on the strong agronomic platform in modern varieties to incorporate key traits that can deliver environmental and quality benefits. The role of genetic improvement in improving product quality, reducing diffuse pollution of nitrogen (N) and phosphorus (P) in soil and water and enabling both mitigation of, and adaptation, to climate change is described. The paper discusses the introgression of traits from the closely related species Trifolium ambiguum and T. nigrescens into T. repens (white clover), which has improved tolerance of soil moisture deficit and increased seed yields. The role of legumes in improving product quality is also discussed.

Key words: Forage legumes, genetic improvement, forage, seed, sustainability

INTRODUCTION

Forage legumes are an integral component of sustainable livestock production systems because of their ability to fix atmospheric N that is then available to the companion grass and as a source of safe, home-grown, traceable protein (Frame and Newbould, 1986). White clover (Trifolium repens L.) breeding at IGER has made significant advances in developing varieties with enhanced forage yield, persistence and tolerance of fertiliser N (Abberton and Marshall, 2005). The increased demand for a source of home-grown protein and expansion of the organic sector, in which red clover is an integral part of rotations led to the red clover (T. pratense) breeding programme recommencing in 1997. This has focused on the development of early and late flowering diploid and tetraploid varieties that are high yielding and persistent. Seed of the first variety from that programme is now commercially available.

Reform of the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP), concerns about diffuse pollution of N and P in the context of the EU Water Framework Directive (WFD) and the impact of climate change have resulted in an increasing emphasis on multi-functional grassland systems, and a greater focus on the role of grassland in delivering ecosystem services. This paper outlines breeding targets and approaches, the challenges in combining improvements in agronomic traits whilst maintaining adequate seed yields and describes how molecular approaches are being combined with conventional plant breeding.
