

Were these policies to be implemented at once, there would be not much of a change in short run aggregate supply. Policy 1 causes an increase, policy 2 causes a smaller but still significant increase and policy 3 has a very small impact relative to the other two (in short-run aggregate supply); that impact being a minor drop. These policies all being implemented at once, however, would cause a very large increase in aggregate demand (AD → AD1). This would result in a lot of demand-pull inflation, and would likely be hard to control without degrading other factors of life such as wages and investment potential. To counteract this large spike in inflation, I would propose increasing imports. Not only does this increase supply, preventing much of cost-push inflation, but it would also reduce demand (c+i+g+(x-m)). Increasing imports will also cause deflation, and the amount of commodities getting imported can also easily be controlled and regulated.

There is also a large effect on the long run aggregate supply (LRAS → LRAS1) caused by these, as all of them increase it significantly. This is not too much of a problem, as there will be a few years beforehand where the government will already know of the increase in aggregate supply, and will be able to prepare for it. This would possibly be in the form of increasing demand in future to balance that out, such as cutting taxes, or introducing a policy that reduces supply to a controlled level. Either way, there is a large increase in LRAS, but it won't pose a major threat to the stability of the economy.

TASK 4:

Employment Definition:

Employment is the amount of people in the population that are involved in the production and distribution of goods and services and are getting paid for it. The levels of employment are directly connected to aggregate supply, as the more people working that there are, the more goods and services can be produced. Employment could also be used as a measure of efficiency of the population. Employment is essential to the circulation of currency, as workers are paid by organisations and that money is then spend by consumers/employees that is then given from those organisations to more workers, and so forth. High rates of employment signify higher rates of efficiency, whereas low rates mean a lower productivity (and in turn aggregate supply).

Current State of Employment in NZ (Pre COVID-19)

As of late 2019, the employment rate stood at 67.5%. This is among the highest the rate has been in history, reaching a peak in late 2018 at 68%. This rate measures the percentage of people that are working over 30 hours a week and are above 16. This is approximately 3/4 of the country helping the economy. If New Zealand were to maximise this and have 100% of people working, it would move the position on the PPF curve outwards, signifying a higher production rate.
