from Cardiphonia or the Utterance of the Heart In the Course of a Real Correspondence Farther he finds that between an increase of engagements on the one hand and the unavoidable effects of advancing years on the other he can expect but little leisure or ability for writing letters in future except upon necessary business By this method of sending to each of his correspondents many letters at once he takes leave of them with the less regret persuaded that he thus communicates the substance of all he could offer if he was able to write to them severally as often and as much at large as in times past About
