

models, imply that an "absolute objective concept of the aesthetic profile does not exist in nature." This line of comparison is further developed in chapter 11, which contrasts the craniofacial proportions of females rated as above and below average for attractiveness. Only 25% of the proportions studied show significant differences between the two groups; the chin appears to be the most important aspect of a pleasing profile. Finally, chapter 12 evaluates facial proportions in children with attention deficit disorder (ADS). Significant differences apparently exist 1) between normal individuals and subjects with ADS and 2) between individuals with ADS who respond favorably and those who respond poorly to medication. It is noteworthy that the control group has more deviant Z-scores than the other groups for some of the comparisons.

Assuming that no shortcuts have been taken to produce the summary statistics, purchase of book may be justified by the information provided in the appendix. It provides valuable reference material for human biologists, clinicians, biomedical engineers, and industrial designers. The reports, which vary in quality, present an opportunity for physical anthropologists to understand better how and why craniofacial proportions are used in clinical situations and, with a little imagination, how they might be used in a variety of future applications.

VARIAION, CULTURE AND EVOLUTION IN AFRICAN POPULATIONS. Edited by Ronald Singer and John K. Lundy. Johannesburg: Witwatersrand University Press. 1986. xvi + 258 pp., figures, tables, references. $50.00 (cloth).

This volume is a festschrift in honor of Hertha de Villiers, a pre-eminent palaeoanthropologist and anatomist in a field where women researchers are indeed rare and one of de Villiers' caliber is rarer still. She is perhaps best known for her monumental work The Skull of the South African Negro: A Biometrical and Morphological Study and her analysis of the controversial Border Cave remains. But as this collection by her students and colleagues well illustrates, her interests and influence are considerably broader. The breadth of this book is enormous, consisting of a foreward by Raymond Dart, an introduction by Ronald Singer, a compendium of de Villiers' lifework and publications, and 19 specific articles. These range from discussions of Proconsul africanus anatomy and behavior (Feldesman) and studies of the soft anatomy of the speech apparatus (Cleaton-Jones, Traill) to Stone Age archaeology (Inskeep, Sampson). This may dissuade some readers who favor more specialized and more narrowly defined volumes, but I actually enjoyed the tremendous breadth of subject matter because all of the articles conform to the spirit of the book (and de Villiers' interests): variation, culture, and evolution in African populations. The incredible diversity of this volume simply demonstrates the numerous ways in which these topics can be approached.

This volume thus offers something of interest for palaeoanthropologists, anatomists, human geneticists, and archaeologists. There are articles that are historical in their orientation (Morris, Wilson), those dealing with analytical methods (Fatti, Wood and Wilson), investigations of growth and development (Preston and Chertkow), presentations of skeletal, dental, or soft tissue variability (Lundy, Cleaton-Jones, Traill, Grine, Sperber, van Reenen), examinations of genetic variability (Singer and Kimura) and the relationship between culture and genetic variability (Jenkins, Nurse), those dealing with palaeontological questions (Feldesman, Sperber, Rightmire), and those addressing the interpretation of archaeological data and material culture (Inskeep, Bedaux, Sampson). Several of the articles make use of the Raymond A. Dart skeletal collection (Morris, Wilson, Fatti, Grine, Lundy, Wood and Wilson), which de Villiers helped to organize and curate, and others discuss the interpretation and analysis of the Border Cave remains (Morris, Fatti, Rightmire). Genetic and historic relationships between Khoi, San, and other southern African populations are discussed by Morris, Wilson, van Reenen, Jenkins, and Singer and Kimura. An important
