Jamie (pseudonym) entered the room hesitantly. He took a few steps, stopped, looked around, and frowned. He was the last of the tutees to arrive at the tutorial center. I was one of the course instructors, and each semester I went with the preservice teachers to the public schools once every week for 14 weeks to supervise their one-to-one tutorial sessions. I had witnessed scenes like the one described in the vignette several times during our tutorial sessions. Jamie is just one of many students who are labeled in the literature as "unsuccessful," "passive," "disengaged," "disenchanted," "helpless," "resistant," "alienated," or "low achieving." Whatever the label, one common factor among these students is that they struggle with reading. Reading expository texts is often a slow and arduous task for them. Such students often become frustrated and develop low
