Situation Theory, Meaning, and Semantic Interpretation

IN THIS CHAPTER, we present the elements of the theory of situations and present an account of semantic interpretation.

2.1 Situation Theory

In this section we discuss the elements of Situation Theory as given in Devlin (in preparation). This lays the groundwork for the theory of semantic interpretation to be presented in the next section.

Situation Theory is an attempt at constructing a mathematical framework for the study of information; its goals include providing a set of tools fine-grained enough to account for all differences in informational content and accounting for the partiality of information. Carrying forward this ambitious program has required a large body of apparatus, much of it calling for more motivation and detailed discussion than can be provided here. What follows is the briefest of introductions to the theory. Much of what is presented here is covered in more detail in Devlin (in preparation); discussion of issues concerning the modeling of Situation Theory has been omitted entirely, but the reader interested in an example of the sort of model presupposed by this chapter is urged to consult Westerstahl (1990).

Many of the issues central to this monograph can be and have been addressed using a more conventional set theoretic underpinning for semantic interpretation. One of the goals of this monograph, then, is simply to provide a feasibility demonstration, a case study showing that the tools of situation theory are appropriate for the analysis
