

a poor husband. And what of Jack? What shame and anger would be his?"

"What? Why didn't you tell me? Did you go after her?"

"This morning. When I told you I was going to look for the fox, I tried to see where she went, but I lost the trail."

"But last night . . . there was a little girl alone outside in the freezing winter and you didn't see if she needed help? She must have wandered away from somebody's cabin."

"I don't know, Mabel."

She went back outside and stared at the little tracks. Just one trail, leading across the snow, away from their cabin and into the trees.

During the next several days the skies cleared, a deep cold settled on the valley, and the child's tracks became edged in frost. They trailed sparkling and delicate through Mabel's thoughts, and left her feeling as if she had forgotten something.

One evening she went to the shelf where a dozen of her favorite books were held in place by mahogany book ends — Emily Dickinson's Poems, Henry David Thoreau's Walking, Frances Hodgson Burnett's Queen Silver-Bell. As she absent-mindedly ran her fingers across the spines, she thought of a fairy tale her father had often read to her. She remembered the worn, blue leather of the cover and the golden hue of the illustrations. In one picture, she recalled, a child reached with her mimned hands down to the old man and woman who knelt before her, the old man and woman who had formed her from snow.

The next day when Mabel went to feed the chickens in the barn, she passed the little foot prints.

She woke to a quiet cabin and sensed the change before she looked out a window or opened the door. It was a muffled quiet, a dense cold pressing at the cabin walls, though it was warm inside. Jack had left her a crackling fire before going to hunt moose again. She dressed quickly and her senses were confirmed when she looked out the window and saw a shining new landscape. The snow had come again, and this time it was a fine, driving snow that had accumulated quickly overnight and buried the cabin and outbuildings. It transformed boulders and stumps into soft, white lumps. It gathered in deep pillows on spruce boughs, it hung heavily over the cabin's eaves, and it erased the tracks across their yard.

She carried a basket of breadcrumbs and dried apple bits leftover from a pie to the barn for the chickens. The hens comforted her, the way they roosted along their spruce pole inside the barn, their feathers ruffled against the cold. When she came in, they hopped to the straw-strewn ground and clucked like old women welcoming a neighbor. They bobbed and stretched their wings. One of the black-and-white hens pecked a scrap from Mabel's fingers, and she stroked its feathered back as it waddled away. She reached into each nesting box and finally, beneath the soft belly of a red hen, found two warm eggs.

Mabel put them in her basket as she left the barn. When she turned to pull the door closed, she noticed a glimpse of blue in the snow-laden spruce trees beyond the barn. She strained her eyes and no longer saw blue, but instead red fur. Blue fabric. Red fur. A child, slight and quick in a blue coat, passing through the trees. A blink, and the little coat was gone and
