The "son of David" Question and the Controversy Story Naomi Christine Sheley, 2022

Mark 12:35-37 is an interpretive crux Since recognizing genre is often important to interpretation this study aims to clarify meaning through investigating the anecdote as an embedded genre a text of one genre embedded in a larger text of another In particular a beginning point is taken in Martin Albertz's early twentieth century theory that the Davidssohnfrage like the dialogues in Mark 11:27-33 and 12:13-34 is a Streitgespräch While most subsequent interpreters disputed this some of these reasons are today questionable in light of contemporary genre theory and existing typologies of gospel anecdotes including descriptions of controversy stories are limited in usefulness by fundamental conflicts with one another Beginning with the anecdotes in Mark 11:27-12:34 a distinct cluster of features was identified described and compared with the son of David question These analyses of genre features were supplemented with close exegetical study a new assessment of son of David and comparable idioms evaluation of the pericope's relation to wider Markan themes and analysis of the pericope's three parallels It was found that the so called controversy story is probably indeed a genre distinct from the broader pronouncement story or anecdote and that Mark 12:35-37 is either a variation of one structural pattern of this genre or has a definite relationship with it However it was also determined that several factors in the argument and its literary and social context narrow the argument's meaning by framing the idiom son of David as a true patronymic The results suggest that the Davidssohnfrage should be interpreted as polemic against the thesis that the messiah is David's son which is not necessarily his descendant The investigation suggested that the polemic is almost certainly connected to the Markan Jesus's status as son of God and is likely an aspect of the larger human divine contrast and radical God centered orientation that frequently characterizes the speech of Mark's Jesus A comparison with Luke and some other NT evidence raised the possibility that the Davidssohnfrage is shaped by a particular reception of the promise to David tradition emphasizing the divine sonship of David's descendant cf 2 Sam 7:14 Ps 2:7
