

Walk-based measure of balance in signed networks: Detecting lack of balance in social networks

(Received 11 July 2014; published 3 October 2014)

There is a longstanding belief that in social networks with simultaneous friendly and hostile interactions (signed networks) there is a general tendency to a global balance. Balance represents a state of the network with a lack of contentious situations. Here we introduce a method to quantify the degree of balance of any signed (social) network. It accounts for the contribution of all signed cycles in the network and gives, in agreement with empirical evidence, more weight to the shorter cycles than to the longer ones. We found that, contrary to what is generally believed, many signed social networks, in particular very large directed online social networks, are in general very poorly balanced. We also show that unbalanced states can be changed by tuning the weights of the social interactions among the agents in the network.

I. INTRODUCTION

Social networks represent a large proportion of the complex socioeconomic organization of modern society. They represent social entities, such as countries, corporations, or people, interconnected through a wide range of social ties, which include political treaties, commercial trade, friendship, and collaboration [1,2]. In recent years a different dimension of social networks has emerged with the development of online social communities, which contribute and share contents on the World Wide Web [3–6]. In many of these scenarios the interactions among the social entities go beyond the simple connected-disconnected networks, e.g., friend-not friend relationship, to include antagonistic relations among the connected entities. These are the cases in which social entities can display, for instance, ally-enemy, friend-foe, or trust-distrust relationships. In these cases the social system must be represented as a signed network in which the edges of the network can be either positive (+) to denote ally, friendship, and trust or negative (−) to denote enemy, foe, and distrust [7–14].

The origin of the study of signed networks can be traced back to the work of Heider [15], who formulated a theory of social balance to understand the causes of tensions and conflicts in networks where friendship and animosity relations coexist. The use of signed networks was then proposed by Cartwright and Harary [16] to model the existence of balance and unbalance in such social systems. The lack of balance in a signed network is produced by the existence of groups of individuals cyclically connected where the number of negative edges is odd [16–20]. For instance, a triad in which Bob and Sue are friends with Mike but are unfriendly with each other is believed to be destabilized by the attempts of Bob (Sue) to strengthen his (her) relation with Mike by suggesting he (she) breaks with Sue (Bob). This unpleasant situation is believed to catalyze a change in the social relations to produce a balanced state in the network.

A signed network is balanced if and only if all its cycles are positive, where the sign of a cycle is the product of the signs of its edges. This black-and-white consideration of network balance has been widely studied and documented in social systems for many years. Only recently, has grayscale, in which the quantitative determination of how unbalanced a social network is, been considered in the literature [8–10]. Some of these approaches consider only triads to account for balance, which excludes the contribution to unbalance of longer cycles [8], or do not provide local information about individual contributions to balance [9]. A method for computing the degree of unbalance of a signed network was proposed by Facchetti et al. [10] by using ground-state calculations in large-scale Ising spin glasses. Using their approach for undirected versions of three online social networks, they concluded that “currently available networks are indeed extremely balanced” [10]. This conclusion agrees very well with Heider’s balance theory. In previous work, Leskovec et al. [8] analyzed the statistical significance of all possible triads in the same online social networks. Their results contrast very much with those of Facchetti et al. [10], as they found that the abundance of certain signed triads does not follow Heider’s theory and is more in line with Davis’s weaker notion of balance [21], which states that only the triangles with two positive edges (“the enemy of my enemy is my friend”) are implausible in real social networks, but all other triangles are permissible. When the more realistic directed versions of these networks were considered by Leskovec et al. [8] they concluded that “many of basic predictions of balance theory no longer apply.” On the one hand, Leskovec et al. [8] considered only signed triads, which are arguably the most important fragments in determining balance, but not the only ones. On the other hand, the method of Facchetti et al. [10] gives the same importance to the lack of balance in every cycle, indistinctly of its length. This contrasts with the well-documented fact that the longer cycles have less effect upon a person’s tension than the shorter ones [22].

These discrepancies are not only on the quantitative side of the problem but also in the conceptual one. Using the previous hypothetical example, it is plausible that Mike feels comfortable by acting as a mediator in the disputes between Bob and Sue and that Bob (Sue) feels certain stability in the use
