mellow warmth of the vine singing in his blood He was an artist it is true always an artist but somehow sober the high pitch and lilt went out of his thought processes and he was prone to be as deadly dull as a British Sunday not dull as other men are dull but dull when measured by the sprightly wight that Monte Carquinez was when he was really himself From all this it must not be inferred that Carquinez who is my dear friend and dearer comrade was a sot Far from it He rarely erred As I have said he was an artist He knew when he had enough and enough with him was equilibrium the equilibrium that is yours and mine when we are sober

When God Laughs Jack London, 2021-03-18 I folded the book on my thumb and sat there silent and without moving for along time I was stunned by the clearness of vision the verse had imparted to me It was illumination It was like a bolt of God's lightning in the Pit They would keep Love the fickle sprite the forerunner of young life young life that is imperative to be born I conned the lines over in my mind Not yet sometime O Love not yet Feed it with lipless kisses let it sleep And I laughed aloud ha ha I saw with white vision their blameless souls They were children They did not understand They played with Nature's fire and bedded with a naked sword They laughed at the gods They would stop the cosmic sap They had invented a system and brought it to the gaming table of life and expected to win out Beware I cried The gods are behind the table They make new rules for every system that is devised You have no chance to win But I did not so cry to them I waited They would learn that their system was worthless and throw it away They would be content with whatever happiness the gods gave them and not strive to wrest more away I watched I said nothing The months continued to come and go and still the famine edge of their love grew the sharper Never did they dull it with a permitted love clasp They ground and whetted it on self denial and sharper and sharper it grew This went on until even I doubted Did the gods sleep I wondered Or were they dead I laughed to myself The man and the woman had made a miracle They had outwitted God They had shamed the flesh and blackened the face of the good Earth Mother They had played with her fire and not been burned They were immune They were themselves gods knowing good from evil and tasting not Was this the way gods came to be I asked myself I am a frog I said But for my mudlidded eyes I should have been blinded by the brightness of this wonder I have witnessed I have puffed myself up with my wisdom and passed judgment upon gods Yet even in this my latest wisdom I was wrong They were not gods They were man and woman soft clay that sighed and thrilled shot through with desire thumbed with strange weaknesses which the gods have no

When God Laughs Jack London, 2021-02-24 If you don't git up Johnny I won't give you a bite to eat The threat had no effect on the boy He clung stubbornly to sleep fighting for its oblivion as the dreamer fights for his dream The boy's hands loosely clenched themselves and he made feeble spasmodic blows at the air These blows were intended for his mother but she betrayed practised familiarity in avoiding them as she shook him roughly by the shoulder Lemme lone It was a cry that began muffled in the deeps of sleep that swiftly rushed upward like a wail into passionate belligerence and that died away and sank down into an inarticulate whine It was a bestial cry as of a soul in torment filled with infinite protest and pain But she did not mind She was a sad eyed tired faced woman and she had grown used to this task which she repeated every day of her life She got a grip on the bedclothes and tried to strip them down but the boy ceasing his punching clung to them desperately In a huddle at the foot of the bed he still remained covered Then she tried dragging the bedding to the floor The boy opposed her She braced herself Hers was the superior weight and the boy and bedding gave the former instinctively following the latter in order to shelter against the chill of the room that bit into his body As he toppled on the edge of the bed it seemed that he must fall head first to the floor But consciousness fluttered up in him He righted himself and for a moment perilously balanced Then he struck the floor on his feet On the instant his mother seized him by the shoulders and shook him Again his fists struck out this time with more force and directness At the same time his eyes opened She released him He was awake All right he mumbled She caught up the lamp and hurried out leaving him in darkness You'll be docked she warned back to him He did not mind the darkness When he had got into his clothes he went out into the kitchen His tread was very heavy for so thin and light a boy His legs dragged with their own weight which seemed unreasonable because they were such skinny legs He drew a broken bottomed chair to the table

The gods the gods are stronger time Falls down before them all men's knees Bow all men's prayers and sorrows climb Like incense toward them yea for these Are gods Felise Carquinez had relaxed finally He stole a glance at the rattling windows looked upward at the beamed roof and listened for a moment to the savage roar of the south easter as it caught the bungalow in its bellowing jaws Then he held his glass between him and the fire and laughed for joy through the golden wine It is beautiful he said It is sweetly sweet It is a woman's wine and it was made for gray robed saints to drink We grow it on our own warm hills I said with pardonable California pride You rode up yesterday through the vines from which it was made It was worth while to get Carquinez to loosen up Nor was he ever really himself until he felt the mellow warmth of the vine singing in his blood He was an artist it is true always an artist but somehow sober the high pitch and lilt went out of his thought processes and he was prone to be as deadly dull as a British Sunday not dull as other men are dull but dull when measured by the sprightly wight that Monte Carquinez was when he was really himself From all this it must not be inferred that Carquinez who is my dear friend and dearer comrade was a sot Far from it He rarely erred As I have said he was an artist He knew when he had enough and enough with him was equilibrium the equilibrium that is yours and mine when we are sober His was a wise and instinctive temperateness that savoured of the Greek Yet he was far from Greek I am Aztec I am Inca I am Spaniard I have heard him say And in truth he looked it a compound of strange and ancient races what with his swarthy skin and the asymmetry and primitiveness of his features His eyes under massively arched brows were wide apart and black with the blackness that is barbaric while before them was perpetually falling down a great black mop of hair through which he gazed like a roguish satyr from a thicket He invariably wore a soft flannel shirt under his velvet corduroy jacket and his necktie was red This latter stood for the red flag he had once lived with the socialists of Paris and it symbolized the blood and brotherhood of man Also he had never been known to wear anything on his head save a leather banded sombrero It was even rumoured that he had been born with this particular piece of headgear And in my experience it was provocative of nothing short of sheer delight to see that Mexican sombrero hailing a cab in Piccadilly or storm tossed in the crush for the New York Elevated As I have said Carquinez was made quick by wine as the clay was made quick when God breathed the breath of life into it was his way of saying it I confess that he was blasphemously intimate with God and I must add that there was no blasphemy in him He was at all times honest and because he was compounded of paradoxes greatly misunderstood by those who did not know him He could be as elementally raw at times as a screaming savage and at other times as delicate as a maid as subtle as a Spaniard And well was he not Aztec Inca Spaniard And now I must ask pardon for the space I have given him He is my friend and I love him The house was shaking to the storm as he drew closer to the fire and laughed at it through his wine He looked at me and by the added lustre of his eye and by the alertness of it I knew that at last he was pitched in his proper key
