Soviet Foreign Trade The Decision Process:

Soviet Foreign Trade S.H. Gardner, 2012-12-06 The enigma of Soviet society is nowhere more strikingly manifested than in its economic relations with the outside world Western business people even those with representative offices in Moscow often describe their negotiations with the Soviets as a veritable black box affair Offers for purchase and sale are funneled into the bureaucracy usually via the Ministry of Foreign Trade where they are digested for very long periods of time When a response emerges little is usually known about the level at which decisions were made and even less is known about the criteria that were employed to make them In the abstract at least foreign trade decision making in the Western market economies is a rather simple exercise An American consumer will purchase a Toyota rather than a comparable Chrysler if its price expressed in dollars at the market exchange rate is lower The influences of governmental tariffs quantitative restrictions foreign exchange controls buy American policies and the like are usually of only secondary importance In contrast the Soviet consumer whether an individual or an industrial enterprise does not generally have the authority to order the importation of goods or services That authority is concentrated at the top of Soviet society and administered through a labyrinthine system of overlapping bureaucratic agencies Furthermore those Soviet agencies cannot respond to price signals in the same way as the American consumer can because Soviet domestic prices and exchange rates are themselves set rather arbitrarily by governmental agencies

Learning from Capitalists Mikael Sandberg,1989 Technology assimilation as an outcome of a nation s acquisition of foreign technology has not been explicitly interpreted the way assimilation is normally understood assimilation of knowledge and behaviour in an individual s cognitive development or assimilation as a means for organisms enhanced control of the environment Why not consider technology assimilation as a process by which nations learn from existing technology abroad thereby not only developing domestic civilian industry but also enhancing their control of the external international environment by means of military technical expertise Soviet assimilation of Western technology as one major example of this process is both a means for domestic industrial modernization and a way in which the USSR strengthens its military power analysis based on the conceptual framework indicated above It suggests new directions in technology assimilation data analysis and presents further insights into how Western technology is assimilated in the USSR problems of assimilation occur which Soviet countermeasures there are and how the USSR and Sweden adapt to international technology trade restraints
