

Misconceptions about Linguistics

Linguistics is the scientific study of language. It includes the study of grammar, syntax, and phonetics. Specific branches of linguistics include sociolinguistics, dialectology, psycholinguistics, computational linguistics, comparative linguistics, and structural linguistics. It is majorly divisible into micro and macro linguistics. Micro Linguistics (Phonetics (how speech sounds are produced, transmitted, and perceived), Phonology (how sound functions in the speech sound), Morphology (how words are formed), Semantics (how meanings are created), Pragmatics (how we use language in our everyday life). Macro Linguistics (Sociolinguistics (studies the role of language in society), Psycholinguistics (studies how language is processed in mind), Neurolinguistics (deals with the underlying neurological structures and processes), Computational linguistics (studies with the use of computer to model human language processing), Mathematical Linguistics (discusses the mathematical properties of human language grammar), Historical Linguistics (studies the history of language change), Philosophical Linguistics (it studies the state of reality and being as related to and reflected in language), Political Linguistics (it discusses the language policies with politics), Applied Linguistics (it discusses the use of linguistics in language teaching, analysis of style and speech therapy)). Linguistics is a new branch of knowledge in our educational system for studying knowledge with modern principles, and is undoubtedly a relatively recent phenomenon. It has various misconceptions about the nature of this subject in its beginning. Yet, the subject has been developing very rapidly the years and has got a fortified situation at educational institutions almost all over the world. Many people have some misconceptions about Linguistics. Here we are clarifying some of the misconceptions about Linguistics.
