

Annual Survey of State Government Finances Summary: 2023

Key Findings

The 2023 survey reveals a significant shift in state government revenue sources. Sales tax has emerged as the dominant revenue stream, increasing its share from 27% in 2022 to 28%. This trend is largely driven by the implementation of new or increased sales taxes in several states, particularly in the Southeast and Midwest regions. The increase in sales tax revenue has partially offset the decline in income tax revenue, which fell from 24% to 25%.

Property tax remains a critical and stable source of revenue for most states, accounting for 22% of total revenue in 2023. While there has been a slight increase in property tax revenue in some states, others have experienced declines due to local government budget cuts and exemptions. Corporate tax revenue, which has been a major focus for many states in recent years, continues to grow, contributing 15% to the total in 2023, up from 16% in 2022.

The 'Other' category, which includes various taxes and fees, continues to provide a steady stream of revenue, representing 10% of the total. This category is particularly important for states that rely heavily on specific taxes like gambling or liquor. The overall revenue picture for 2023 shows a state government that is increasingly dependent on sales tax, a trend that may have long-term implications for fiscal policy and economic development.

Looking ahead, state governments will need to carefully manage their revenue streams as economic conditions fluctuate. The continued growth of sales tax revenue is a positive sign, but it also highlights the need for diversification. States that have successfully balanced their budgets and maintained strong public services will likely continue to attract investment and drive economic growth, further solidifying their position in the national economy.
